FLAGSEEK BIG PICTURE

Your Big Picture

A clear look at what your questionnaire says matters most, what has to work together, and where the move may create opportunity or strain.

This report does not choose a country. It uses your questionnaire to show what matters most, which needs have to hold together, where your plan may have an advantage, and what your Country Match report will explore.

WHAT YOUR QUESTIONNAIRE SAYS

What matters most in your situation

ESSENTIAL

A permanent move that works for both children

Your two children need different plans: your younger child, born in 2019, needs an education path through secondary school, while your adult child, born in 2001, needs particular attention to residence rights. Some countries allow adult children to accompany parents only under specific dependency conditions; others require them to qualify independently. School systems also differ in language, newcomer support, public access, and private or international tuition. The better fit keeps the household together without making an expensive school arrangement—or another international move—necessary later.

ESSENTIAL

Healthcare you can access, not just qualify for on paper

Your existing public-healthcare connection and the medication-continuity issue identified in your profile make the coverage transition important. Some countries admit new residents to public care promptly; others require contributions, a waiting period, or private insurance first. Eligibility also does not guarantee convenient appointments or nearby providers. A better fit offers a clear way to enter coverage, affordable care where you can realistically live, and a manageable transition. Your current coverage and medication arrangements need separate checks, addressed below.

ESSENTIAL

Lower living costs without letting housing absorb the savings

Lowering costs is a major reason for your move, and your housing target is $2,500–$3,500 a month. Your stated recurring income totals $42,000 annually—about $3,500 monthly—but the amounts mix before-tax and after-tax figures, so that is not a spendable-income estimate. Countries differ in rental costs, upfront deposits, taxes, and whether healthcare or education requires substantial separate payment. Your flexibility about housing type helps. The strongest fit offers good everyday value, with a sustainable funding plan for spending above recurring income and room for the $2,000 in annual business expenses you recorded.

ESSENTIAL

Remote income now, a durable plan for retirement later

Your plan combines $30,000 in remote employment income with $12,000 in investment income, alongside business activity and retirement within five years. Some countries permit overseas remote work under a suitable residence status; others restrict it or create employer, business, tax, and social-contribution obligations. Renewal rules also differ when work income ends. Because you want permanent residence rather than a temporary stay, the better fit supports your current activities and a realistic transition to retirement. Confirm employer approval and how income, retirement withdrawals, and any future public benefits would be treated.

ESSENTIAL

Three languages give you a stronger start

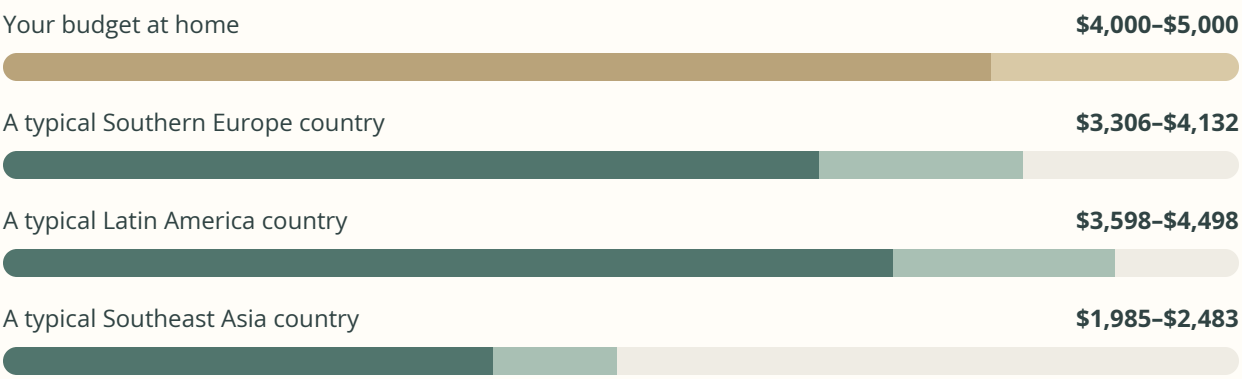

Spanish, French, and English give you useful room to choose a place where daily life feels manageable. You may also learn another language if necessary, but that should not become an unexamined requirement. Countries vary in the languages used for public administration, healthcare, and long-term residence requirements; local communities can differ just as much. A better fit lets you use your existing languages for important tasks while building local relationships. The question is how far those languages carry you beyond visitor-facing services.

YOUR BUDGET, YOUR POSSIBILITIES

Where your stated budget may go further

You stated that a total monthly spending budget of $4,000–$5,000 would feel comfortable. What that budget can provide varies considerably by country; choosing carefully may give you more room for the everyday life you want. The important comparison is the complete cost of living, not just the cheapest rent.

THE SAME LIFESTYLE, PRICED ABROAD (PER MONTH)

In a typical Southeast Asia country, the life you described could cost about 50% less each month.

Estimated with FlagSeek's country cost ratios for housing, groceries, transport, healthcare and leisure. Each bar is a typical example from that region, not a recommendation. Country Match prices the specific countries that fit you, including school, insurance and pet costs these bars leave out.

Country Match can help identify countries where your selected budget may stretch further, while weighing housing, healthcare, residency requirements, taxes, safety, and the other needs in your questionnaire. The goal is a financially sustainable fit, not simply the lowest price.

Your questionnaire separately records about $42,000 in annual recurring income, which is below the annual equivalent of the spending range you selected. This does not establish that the move is out of reach: savings, future earnings, or other resources may be part of your plan. Any difference will need a sustainable way to be funded; a lower-cost destination alone cannot establish that.

THE REAL COMBINATION

What has to work at the same time

Each of these has to work in the same place at the same time. A country that wins on one and fails another is not a fit.

For a permanent family move, your adult child's residence options could narrow the choices more than your own work arrangements. An existing family citizenship connection may change that picture, so it is worth examining before organizing the whole move around one adult's remote income.

Your younger child's school language can materially change the housing search. A workable public-school option may leave more financial room, while reliance on international tuition can make an otherwise cheaper location less affordable; Country Match will examine education access alongside realistic places to live.

Retirement within five years makes the length and renewal terms of residence especially important. A country that accommodates your current remote work still needs a credible answer for what happens when that income stops, including how healthcare access and long-term affordability change.

ROOM TO MANEUVER

Where your plan has flexibility

Your remote employment and investment income reduce dependence on finding a new local job. That widens the search, subject to employer approval, lawful work arrangements, and what remains after taxes and expenses.

Speaking Spanish, French, and English gives you more ways to handle appointments, administration, and social life without starting from the beginning in every setting.

You are flexible about housing type and want a balance of value and quality rather than simply the lowest price. That creates room to compare homes near suitable schools and healthcare instead of choosing on rent alone.

ISSUES TO VALIDATE

What deserves a closer look

Ancestry or citizenship-by-descent possibilities

Your questionnaire records that a grandparent has a legal or family connection to Greece through birth and citizenship. That is a lead worth checking, not a destination recommendation. A parent or grandparent connection can sometimes create a citizenship, nationality, documentation, or residence pathway that is much stronger than an ordinary visa route. Country Match should flag the connection as something to verify through official records and the relevant country's current nationality rules rather than assume eligibility.

What happens to your current healthcare coverage

Your recorded public-healthcare connection needs a program-specific check: confirm what covers you now, whether it pays overseas, and what happens when you return or re-enroll. If it is Medicare, coverage outside your home country is generally limited, so a separate overseas healthcare plan is needed. Before changing Part B, verify future enrollment rules and possible continuing late-enrollment penalties; Country Match will examine destination coverage alongside this transition.

Medication continuity

The medication-continuity need identified in your profile calls for an exact medicine-by-medicine check. Countries may approve different drugs or formulations, require a local prescription, or restrict imports and controlled medicines. Country Match will examine exact availability, prescribing and monitoring requirements, pharmacy access, insurance coverage or self-pay cost, and a lawful bridge supply. The better fit allows treatment to continue through ordinary local care rather than depending on repeated overseas purchases or uncertain import permission.

Relationship recognition for immigration and residence

Your marriage needs to work specifically for family residence, not merely be accepted as a valid document. Countries differ in whether a spouse can accompany the main applicant, which evidence they require, whether accompanying spouses may work, and how renewals operate. Some circumstances require each adult to qualify separately. Country Match will examine whether your specific marriage supports a clear, renewable household residence arrangement, with official confirmation of any case-specific requirements.

Relationship recognition after residence

Your permanent-move plan also makes the everyday legal effects of marriage important. Immigration recognition does not automatically settle healthcare decision-making, next-of-kin status, inheritance, survivor rights, property, taxes, benefits, or insurance. Countries may recognize the marriage broadly, require local registration, or apply different rules to particular rights. Country Match will distinguish these domestic consequences from immigration recognition, so you can identify where local registration, wills, or professional legal advice may still be needed.

REALITY TEST

What could make a promising place fail

A country can look promising on paper and still fall short of what matters to you if:

This move has to work for the household as a whole. A destination can look good for one person and still fail the family needs identified in your questionnaire if school, dependent, partner, care, or everyday household needs do not hold together.

A lower-cost destination is no bargain if the healthcare continuity identified in your questionnaire breaks down because insurance, medication, specialists, or ongoing care are not dependable where you could realistically live.

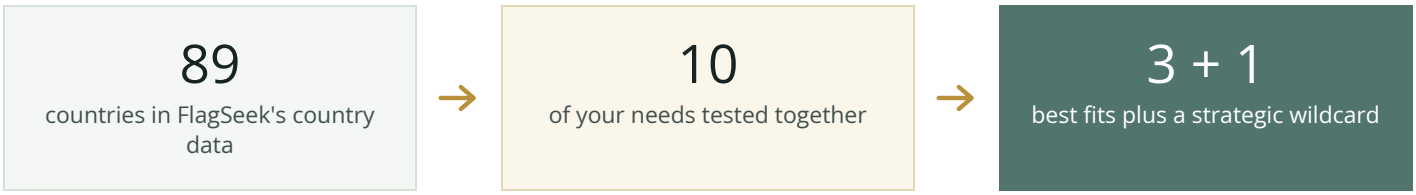

Your selected $4,000–$5,000 monthly spending range may go further in some countries than others, but the advantage can shrink if healthcare, taxes, transportation, or other recurring costs are overlooked. Country Match can help find places where the full budget and your other needs fit together.

The income plan in your questionnaire also has to survive the move: a country can look affordable and still be a poor fit if residence rules, taxes, social contributions, limits on work, or rules affecting whether benefits continue weaken the income you are counting on.

A place can work beautifully on paper and still wear thin if the community and long-term belonging you asked for turn into a daily struggle with language, administration, social connection, or ordinary participation.

QUESTIONS FOR COUNTRY MATCH

What your Country Match report will explore

Visa & residency routes · Cost of living · Healthcare · Safety & stability · Welcoming & social fit · Schools & family residence · Remote work & taxes · Language & community · Housing costs · Pet import rules

Could your recorded grandparent connection or your spouse's existing citizenship connection create nationality or family residence rights worth verifying before relying on a work-based arrangement?

Which countries offer sustainable healthcare access for your household, accounting for current coverage, overseas gaps, destination enrollment rules, and return or re-enrollment arrangements?

Where can the required medications and exact formulations remain legally available with workable prescribing, monitoring, pharmacy access, costs, and a transition supply?

Which countries recognize your marriage for family residence and, separately, for healthcare authority, inheritance, property, taxes, and other important rights after arrival?

Where would your $42,000 in stated recurring income and any additional planned resources best support your spending goals after taxes, business expenses, housing, healthcare, education, and transportation?

Which countries offer a plausible long-term arrangement for your remote work and later retirement while accommodating your adult child's residence needs and your younger child's education through secondary school?

Why Country Match is different

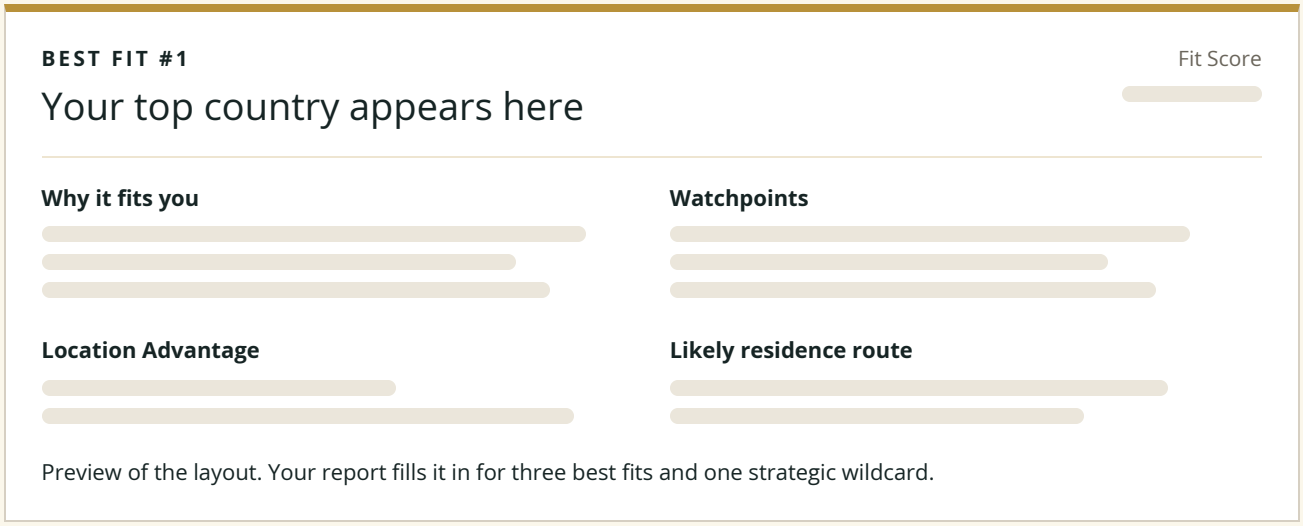

Country Match is more than a list of appealing countries. It takes your questionnaire as a whole and tests your needs together across actual countries: $42,000 in stated recurring income, lawful remote work, both children's different needs, healthcare and medication access, marriage recognition, and the costs of a permanent move.

Your residency profile

Remote-work residence and retirement or passive-income residence are broad options worth investigating, without assuming eligibility. Country Match's customer-specific Viability Index helps compare where you appear to have a plausible, durable legal path alongside the rest of your needs. Your family's existing citizenship connections also deserve verification.

When one country becomes serious

Once a country becomes a serious contender, Action Plan can compare its plausible visa or residence pathways and show which appear strongest to investigate first. It can then organize verification, documents, sequencing, location choices, arrival arrangements, deeper retirement planning, and questions for qualified professionals.
